

Hashmita

(Naam to nahi suna hoga!)

If It's not fun, I Fix it!

I engage with thousands of people every day, and somehow, none of them have blocked me yet. That's gotta count for something, right?

①

By day, I manage
social communities!

②

By night, I write!

③

I hop on stage once in a blue moon, just enough to keep the artist in me alive!

Chapter 1: Mai apni favourite hu!

I wasn't born a main character—I was cast as one by my dad.
His bedtime stories didn't just entertain—they starred me.

From solving crimes with Byomkesh Bakshi to being the fourth
power puff girl,
I've played
them all.

Although, as I grew older, my love for stories became my dad's concern. A teacher by profession, he saw no value in books that didn't end up in exams, But I somehow always managed to convince him that buying that hardcover comic was vital for my survival!

Marketing Lesson?

If you can sell an overpriced novel to brown parents, you can sell anything.

Chapter 2: Kyunki Delhi se hu Behen-ODE

I went on to study English Literature at Delhi University and it was chaotic in the best way: debates, dramatics, poetry slams. I joined everything, half out of interest, half because I didn't want to go home at 3 PM.

Somewhere between planning events , I found myself as the President of the Literary Society. I organised fests that felt way bigger than they were, and somehow convinced sponsors that poetry does pull crowds

Marketing Lesson?

If you can convince your college fest sponsor that 17 college kids and a rented mic setup is a “high-visibility brand opportunity,” you’ve got experience in client servicing!

Chapter 3: Shuru majboori me kia tha!

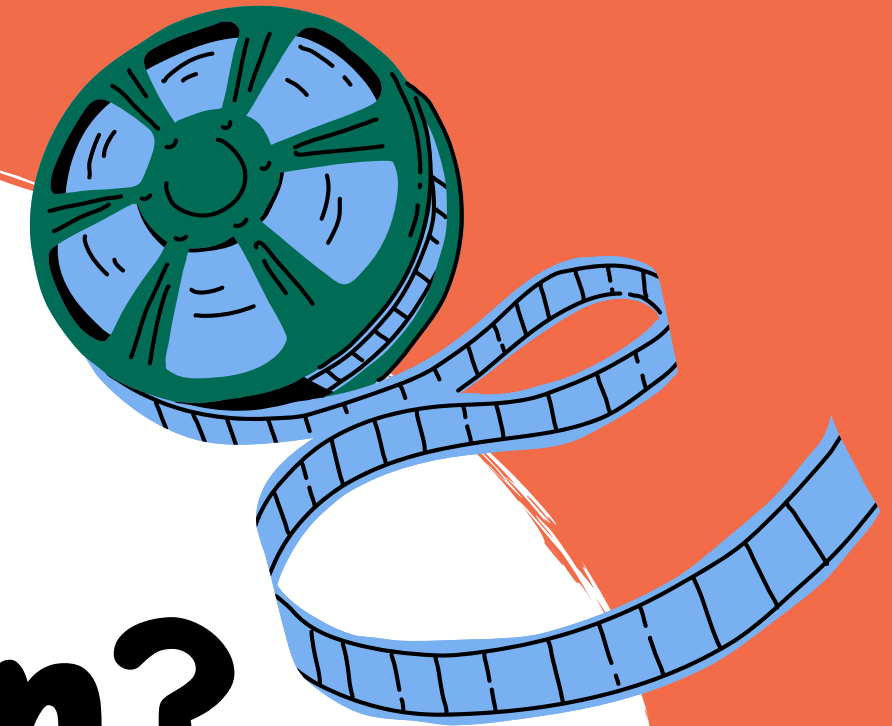

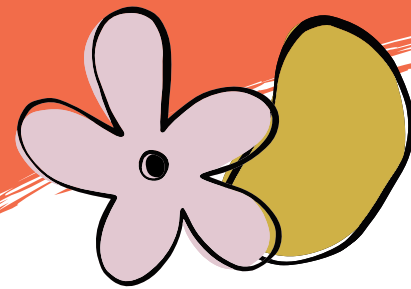

(AB Maza ara hai)

At 19, I joined MCMV as a Community Engagement Associate. Which sounds fancy, but what it really meant was uniting writers across India like a broke, literary Avengers!

Writers would show up with spoken word pieces that made us all question our life choices. It started as a bunch of strangers with mics; but honestly, the community healed us. Or at least kept us distracted.

This was peak covid when I hosted open mics on Zoom while praying my mom didn't start vacuuming in the background. Spoiler: She always did!

Marketing Lesson?

Step 1: Make a group chat.
Step 2: Accidentally give people
a reason to feel things.
Boom—brand loyalty.

Chapter 4: Kuch Toofani karte hain?

I packed my bags and took a 2,000 km flight away from home to Bangalore to be a part of a small marketing agency.

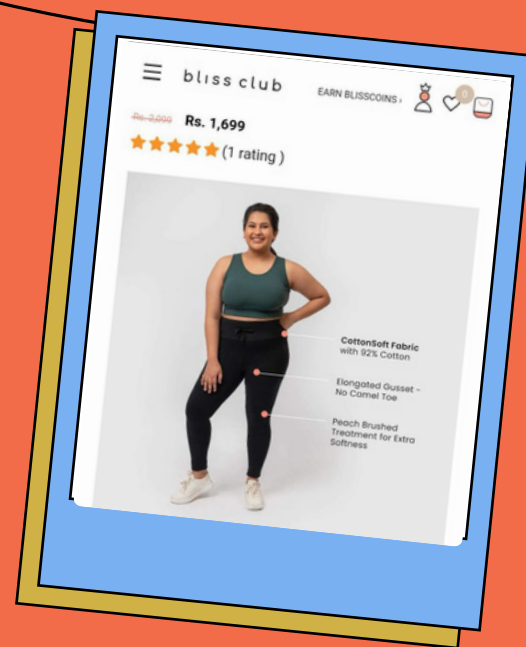

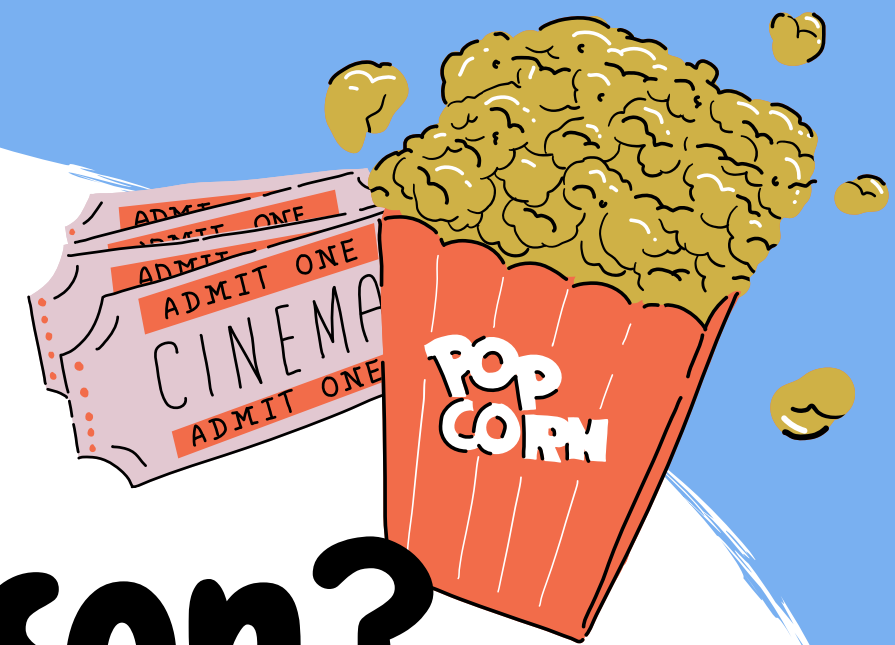

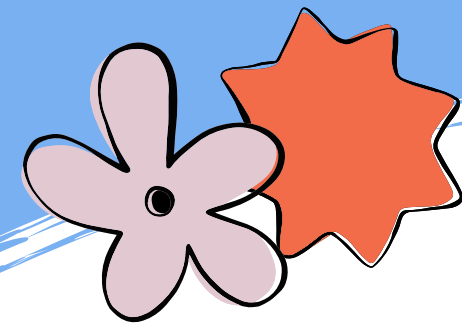

On paper, I was a Campaign Manager.

In reality, I was running after influencers, chasing payments, faking confidence in client calls, and learning to sound like I knew the difference between “engagement” and “reach” (still not sure)

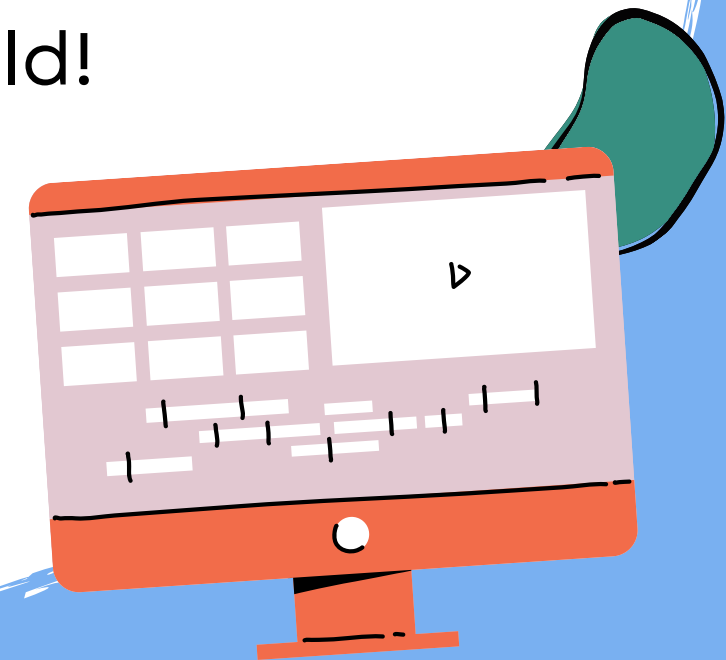

I used to manage 15 campaigns, 70+ influencers a month and still had time to stress-eat. I convinced influencers to post on time, sometimes through reminders, sometimes through emotional blackmail. I wrote ad scripts with fewer lies than a dating app bio. Every day felt like I was running a school play where nobody remembered their lines—but the show still went on.

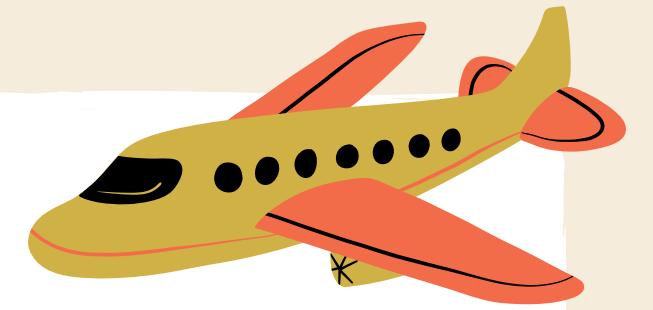

Marketing Lesson?

If you can manage 70 influencers and still have the will to live, you can conquer the world!

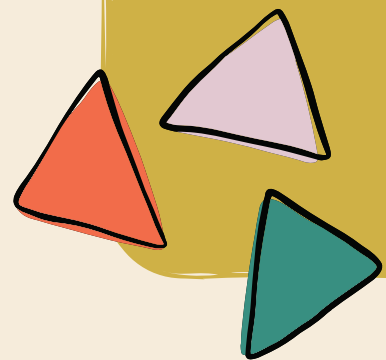

Chapter 5: Dil Chahta Hai... to Market Luxury

After convincing the internet that they needed sheet masks, beard oils, and the life-changing difference between niacinamide and vitamin C (it's real, ok?),

I knew it was time to trade up. Enter: Karma Group—a luxury hospitality brand spread across 13 countries. The brief? “Make luxury look effortless.” I said yes! (and immediately Googled how to sound British without offending anyone!)

(The Engagement grew massively—not flexing, just data.)

Now, I manage the entire social media universe—Global, India, Asia, F&B, and our furry friend's Insta (still unconfirmed).

I coordinate shoots!

Curate
newsletter
for bougie travelers!

Craft content that people “accidentally”
engage with.

Organise events to engage our community!

Marketing Lesson?

Luxury doesn't sell itself. But a reel with a drone shot and jazz music?
That might.

Aap convince hogaye hain ya mai or bolu?

If you've made it this far and even slightly enjoyed yourself, or mildly reconsidered your hiring plans, I'd call that a win. Ping me if you're curious. Or just bored.
I'm great with both!
